In the midst of a great deal of undergrowth at the end of Stoney Ridge Road is a mid-19th century farmhouse in derelict condition. It is a four bay long, two and one-half story frame structure with two bay, one and one-half story wing and another, possibly earlier, one and one-half story wing at right angles to the latter.

The front portion of the house is built on a brick foundation, the walls are covered with weatherboard and the roof with asphalt shingle. At both ends of the taller part of the house is a brick chimney within the gable. What windows remain have 6/6 sash and louvered shutters. No sash exist in the two dormers but they appear to have had 6/6 sash. There is no chimney on the gable of the one and one-half story part. The principle entrance is located in the third bay from the east end and is composed of a four panel door with sidelights and transom. Traces of a former porch are visible around the entrance. In front of the west portion is a leanto screened porch and there is a door and window opening thereon.

9/6 sash remain in the windows of the back wing. It is three bays long and has a chimney on its north gable. It was formerly the kitchen. Its dormers have 6/6 sash. Around a portion of the house is a brick gutter to carry the water away from the foundation.

To the west of the kitchen are the walls of two stone structures probably a dairy and smoke house. The walls are covered with ivy. The use of stone as a building material is confined to a narrow ridge extending from Town Point to the Choptank River. Only outbuildings are constructed of the material.

The floor plan of the house consists of, from east to west, a parlor, stair hall, den and corridor, and dining room. From the dining room the kitchen extends to the north. Much of the original Ante-bellum woodowrk exists, though in poor condition.
